

INVESTIGATING SANITATION OF SURFACE WATER FOR POULTRY USING CHLORINE-IBDV MODELS

Published: 1 June 2001

Authors: T. Bagust

Organisation: University of Melbourne

Time: Jun 2001

Categories: Biosecurity & Flock Health

Tags: biosecurity, chlorine, bacteria, chlorination, chlorine treatment, decontamination, drinking water, egg production, IBDV, infectious bursal disease virus, pathogens, sanitation, surface water, viral infection, water sources, water treatment

Significant numbers of commercial poultry production sites in Australia rely on surface waters (dams, creeks and rivers) as their major source of drinking water. Exposure of surface water to wild birds can pose disease risks from serious avian pathogens to commercial flocks meaning risk assessment for biosecurity is crucial. This report reviewed the main methodologies used for water sanitation in Australia and indicated that chlorination is the most appropriate technology for poultry sites, if effective treatment can be assured.

PROJECT SUMMARY

Investigating Sanitation of Surface Water for Poultry using Chlorine-IBDV Models
PDF (307 KB)

FULL REPORT

Investigating Sanitation of Surface Water for Poultry using Chlorine-IBDV Models
PDF (87 KB)