

Investigating sanitation of surface water for poultry using chlorine - IBDV models

The University of Melbourne

1 July 2005 T. Bagust, D. O'Rourke, P. Cowling Biosecurity & Flock Health sustainability, egg drop syndrome, Newcastle disease, surface water, viral, contamination, bacterial, chlorine

To minimise the spread of disease, chlorination has been identified as the most appropriate and cost effective method for treating surface water in the poultry industry.

To minimise the spread of disease, chlorination has been identified as the most appropriate and cost effective method for treating surface water in the poultry industry. This study was undertaken in order to develop a process for quantifying and managing the risk of surface water contamination in Australian poultry production.