

Urban fringe land use conflict: Two poultry case studies

Organisation: University of New England

Publication: 1 June 2000

Researchers: S. Henderson and R. Epps

Categories: Environmental Sustainability

Tags: poultry industry, agriculture, egg industry, environment, farming practice, land use, land use conflict

Land use is a common source of conflict for many sectors of Australian agriculture including the poultry industry, particularly in areas on the urban fringe or where there is significant rural residential development.

Land use is a common source of conflict for many sectors of Australian agriculture including the poultry industry, particularly in areas on the urban fringe or where there is significant rural residential development. To determine effective solutions to this issue, this study investigated two case study areas in Australia and conducted extensive interviews with relevant groups in order to produce a set of recommendations for the Australian poultry industry.